Common used cardboard styles for auto part packaging box

Corrugated Boxes: These boxes are the most common packaging type for auto parts. Corrugated boxes are sturdy and easy to customize. Corrugated boxes come in various sizes, and their strength can be customized based on the weight and size of the auto parts being packaged.

Folding Cartons: Folding cartons are a popular option for packaging small auto parts, such as fuses or filters. They are made from lightweight paperboard and customized to fit the specific size and shape of the auto part. Folding cartons are easily assembled and are cost-effective for large quantities.

Partitions: Fence partitions are used to divide a corrugated box into smaller compartments, making it easier to organize and transport small auto parts. Partitions can be made from cardboard, corrugated board, or foam and customized to fit the size and shape of the packaged components.

Inserts: Packaging inserts are used to keep auto parts securely in place inside a box or crate. They are typically made from cardboard or foam and customized to fit the specific size and shape of the part. Inserts are designed to hold multiple parts or to separate and protect fragile parts during transport.

Header cards: Header cards consist of a cardboard header with a clear plastic bag attached below it. The header card can be customized with branding, logos, and product information, while the plastic bag securely holds the auto part. Header cards are commonly used for small auto parts, such as screws, nuts, bolts, and washers, and are an affordable and effective way to package and display these parts.
